or-dǽle; adj. Not having or taking part in a thing, not participating:—Ordǽle expers, Wrt. Voc. ii. 31, 48: 90, 67. Ordǽla expers, i. ignarus, alienus, sine parte, imperitus, inscius, privatus, Wülck. Gl. 232, 23.

or-dǽl, -dēl; generally neuter, but an apparently fem. acc. pl. ordǽla occurs, L. Edg. C. 24; Th. ii. 248, 28. (Cf. O. H. Ger. which has fem. and neut. forms.) In the sense of judicial decision, judgment the word is used by O. Frs. O. Sax. O. H. Ger. (v. Richthofen, the Heliand and Graff), but in A. Sax. it is found only in the special sense, which belongs also to the O. Frs., of a decision which follows an appeal to the Deity. The ordeal was thus connected with religion, and attended by religious ceremonies. In L. Ath. i. 23; Th. i. 210, 26, it is said with respect to the person who is to undergo the ordeal 'fēde hine sylfne mid hlāfe and mid wætere and sealte and wyrtum ǽr hē tō gān scyle, and gestande him mæssan dæra þreora daga (the three days preceding the ordeal) ǽlcne, and geoffrige tō, and gā tō hūsle ðȳ dæge ðe hē tō dam ordǽle gān scyle, and swerige ðonne ðane āþ, ðæt hē sȳ unscyldig ðǽre tihtlan ǽr hē tō dam ordǽle gā.' Before taking the Eucharist and going to the ordeal a solemn form of adjuration was addressed to the person concerned, that unless he was conscious of innocence he should desist. v. Rtl. 114, 13–23. The further proceedings in connection with the ordeal by hot water or by hot iron are detailed in L. Ath. iv. 7; Th. i. 226, 8. After the fire to be used in heating was carried into the church, none were to enter but the priest and the accused. When the iron was hot or the water boiled, two men for the accused, two for the accuser, were admitted, to see that the proceedings were fairly conducted. When hot water was employed, if it were a case of ānfeald tihtle, the hand was plunged in up to the wrist, if of threefold, up to the elbow. When the hot iron was used, a weight of one pound or of three pounds, according to the case, had to be carried nine feet. The hand was then sealed up, and its condition, when unwrapped at the end of three days, determined the guilt or innocence of the accused. See also L. Ath. i. 23; Th. i. 212, 2–10. Further reference to the difference in degree is made in Ath. iv. 6; Th. i. 224, 13: L. Edg. H. 9; Th. i. 260, 18. Among those who were to be subjected to this form of trial are mentioned convicted perjurors, who after conviction are not 'āþwyrde ac ordāles wyrde,' L. Ed. 3; Th. i. 160, 18–21: the man who was charged with plotting against his lord, or with being guilty of 'cyricbryce,' or with practising witchcraft and similar illicit arts underwent the threefold ordeal, L. Ath. i. 4–6; Th. i. 202, 1–17; and the same trial was appointed in the case of incendiaries, L. Ath. iv. 6; Th. i. 224, 11–19, and of coiners, L. Ath. i. 14; Th. i. 206, 17–25: L. Eth. iii. 8; Th. i. 296, 12–16. The ordeal is also mentioned as being the only method of meeting an accusation in a case between English and Welsh, 'ne stent nān ōðer lād æt tihtlan būte ordāl betweox Wealan and Englan,' L. O. D. 2; Th. i. 354, 1–2. The ordeal must take place in a king's burgh, 'Ælc ordāl beó on dæs kyninges byrig, L. Eth. iii. 6; Th. i. 296, 4, and upon fastdays and festivals could not be used, 'ordēl and āþas syndan tōcwedene freólsdagum and rihtfæstendagum,' L. E. G. 9; Th. i. 172, 10: L. Eth. v. 18; Th. i. 308, 24–27: vi. 25; Th. i. 320, 24–27: L. Edg. C. 24; Th. ii. 248, 27. or-yldu. v. or-ildu.

ós a divinity, god, the Anglo-Saxon form of a word whose existence in Gothic is inferred from a passage in Jornandes, 'Gothi proceres suos quasi qui fortuna vincebant non pares homines sed semideos, id est, Anses vocavere.' The Icelandic, which throws out n before s, as the Anglo-Saxon does (cf. Icel. gás: A. S. gós), has áss; pl. æsir, a term which has an application in the opening chapters of the Yngling Saga very similar to that attributed to anses among the Goths: Odin, Thor, and other personages of the Scandinavian mythology are the Æsir. Particularly apparently did the term refer to Thor, so that the proper name Ás-björn is used as the equivalent of Þor-björn. As the first part of Scandinavian proper names it occurs frequently, and it is in the same dependent character that it mostly, if not exclusively, is found in Anglo-Saxon and O. H. German. Thus Ós-beorn, Ós-lác, Ós-wine, Ós-weald preserve the word which is found in Ás-björn, Ás-lákr, Ás-mundr, and this is certainly the independent áss. The O. H. Ger. Ans-gár shews the same word. Whether ós in the sense of god occurs as an independent word is doubtful. It is the name of the Rune ᚬ, which in the Runic poem is accompanied by the following verse:—

'Ós byþ ordfruma ælcre spráce
Wísdómes wraðu and witena frófur
And eorla gehwam eádnis and tóhyht.'

Runic pm. Kmbl. 340, 5–10; Rún. 4.

Kemble translates ós by mouth (as if the Latin word had been taken?), but if the verse is old, the reference might be to Woden. Cf. the account of Óðinn in the Ynglinga Saga: þar þóttust Óðins menn eiga alt traust, er hann var, c. 2. Óðinn var gófgastr af öllum, ok af honum námu þeir allir íþróttirnar: því at hann kunni fyrst allar ok þó flestar. . . . Hann ok hofgoðar hans heita ljóðasmiðir, því at sú íþrótt hófst af þeim í norðrlöndum, c. 6. See also c. 7, and Salm. Kmbl. p. 192: Saga mé hwá ǽrost bócstafas sette? Ic ðé secge Mercurius (= Woden) se gygand. Further in Lchdm. iii. 54, in a charm, occurs a genitive pl. ésa:—Gif hit wǽre ésa gescot, oððe hit wǽre ylfa gescot, oððe hit wǽre hægtessan gescot, nú ic wille ðín helpan. Ðís ðé tó bóte ésa gescotes, &c. . . . But though on the comparison of other forms, a nom. pl. és might be inferred for ós, the change of vowel would not occur in the genitive, which should be ósa. Ésa would point to a singular és (cf. ést; Goth. ansts). The meaning however of the word is that given to ós. See Grmm. D. M. p. 22.

Rôme-burh, -scot. v. Rôm, Rôm-gesceot.

Rôm-feoh ; gen. -feós ; n. Peter's pence. [William of Malmesbury attributes to Ethelwulf the institution of this tax: 'Ethelwulf went to Rome (v. Chron. 855) and there offered to St. Peter that tribute which England pays to this day,' bk. 2, c. 2 ; but in the earlier and similar payment by Offa, established in 787, may probably be seen the origin of the Rómfeoh in England, v. Stubbs, Const. Hist. i. 230. The Chronicle several times during Alfred's reign contains the notice that 'Wesseaxna ælmessan' were sent to Rome, but the first notice in the laws of Rómfeoh occurs in the agreement between English and Danes, to which his son Edward was a party : 'Gif hwá Rómfeoh forhealde gylde lahslit mid Denum, wite mid Englum,' Th. i. 170, 2. The penalty, which is not here stated, was a heavy one, as will be seen from the passages given below. There is no mention in these of any being exempted from the contribution on the score of insufficient means, but in the laws of Edward the Confessor, in that which treats 'de denario Sancti Petri qui Anglice dicitur Rômescot,' it is said : 'Omnis qui habuerit .xxx. denariatas vive pecunie de suo proprio in domo suo, lege Anglorum dabit denarium Sancti Petri.' Further with regard to the time of payment it is enacted : 'Iste (denarius) summoniri debet in festivitate sanctorum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, et ultra festum Sancti Petri ad Vincula non detineatur,' Th. i. 446. So too in the laws of William I : 'Cil ki ad aueir champestre xxx. deñ vaillant deit duner le deñ sein Piere,' Th. i. 474. And see note on p. 170. See too the laws of Henry I : 'Romfech in festo Sancti Petri ad Vincula debet reddi,' Th. i. 520. v. Ducange s.v. Denarius S. Petri.] :—Wé bebeódaþ ælcum cristenum men . . . Rómfeoh . . . Kmbl. 593; An. 297. II a. as the name of an English coin the word is found in the form scætt in the laws of Ethelbert of Kent. It is inferred from a comparison of passages in these that the value of the scætt in Kent was one-twentieth of a shilling, v. Thorpe's Glossary. The sceatt is also mentioned in the Mercian law, Th. i. 190, 5, where '30.000 sceatta' is equivalent to '120 punda.' This would give 250 sceatts to the pound. In the Northern Gospels dragmas decem is glossed by 'fíf sceattas teásíðum,' while the West-Saxon version has 'týn scylingas.' If the sums here given may be regarded as equal, the sceatt would be worth a West-Saxon penny, the value which it appears to have in the Mercian law. The coin then seems to be of different values in Kent and in the more northern parts of England. [Goth. skatts ἀργύριον, ὀπράριον, μνᾶ: O. Sax. skatt *money, property, piece of money: O. scilling, es; m. I. as a denomination of English money (uncoined), a shilling. The shilling appears to have been of different values in different parts of the country; in Wessex five pennies make a shilling: Fíf penegas gemacigaþ ǽnne scillinge, Ælfc. Gr. 50; Som. 52, 8: and with this statement agree several passages of Henry I.'s Laws, e. g. c. 93, §§ 3, 19, where unus solidus = v denarii, duo solidi = x denarii. In Mercia four pennies go to the shilling. According to Mercian law (Th. i. 190) the ceorl's wergild is 200s., the thane's six times as much, 1200s., the king's, which is six times the thane's, is £120; so that 7200s. = 120 × 240*d.*, i.e. the shilling is four pennies. With this agrees L. W. i. 11; Th. i. 473, where it is said: Solidum Anglicum quatuor denarii constituunt. In the Norman time the shilling is twelve pennies. This reckoning seems to be taken in earlier times. v. riht-scilling and Ex. 21, 10. The word is of constant occurrence in the Laws and Charters; from the latter the following passage may illustrate the point that the shilling was a denomination of value, not a coin: Biscop gesalde six hund scillinga on golde, Chart. Th. 90, 21. It also occurs as a weight: Genim of dysse wyrte petroselini swýðe smæl dust ánes scillinges gewihte, Lchdm. i. 240, 11. II. as denoting foreign money the word is used to translate various words:—Scylling numisma, Wrt. Voc. i. 57, 30. Scilling obelus, ii. 63, 68: stater, Mt. Kmbl. Rush. 17, 27. scip-fyllep the private jurisdiction exercised over a group of three hundreds. The word occurs in a charter of Edgar granting to Bishop Oswald certain privileges connected with three hundreds, where in reciting the request that had been made to the king it is said : 'quatinus posset ipse (Oswald) cum monachis suis unam naucupletionem, quod Anglice scypfylled dicitur, per se habere.' The grant of the request is then stated : 'Ego Eadgarus Oswaldo episcopo annuo et dono huius libertatis priuilegium . . . ut ipse episcopus cum monachis suis de istis tribus centuriatibus . . . construant (constituant, Chart. Th. 214) unam naucupletionem, quod Anglice dicitur scypfylled odde scypsócne, in loco quem ob eius memoriam Oswaldeslaw deinceps appellari placuit, ubi querelarum causae secundum morem patriae et legum iura iure discernantur ; habeatque ipse episcopus debita transgressionum . . . et omnia quaecunque rex in suis hundredis habet,' Cod. Dip. Kmbl. vi. 240. The connection between the sense in which the word seems to be used in the charter and the meanings of the two parts of the compound may perhaps be found in the entry under the year 1008 in the Chronicle. It there apparently states, that from every three hundred hides one ship should be furnished to the national fleet. v. Stubbs' Const. Hist. i. 105, and cf. Kemble's Saxons in England, i. 255. The word fylleþ occurs in the compound winter-fylleþ, q. v. ; cf. also Icel. skip-sókn a ship's crew.

In a later Latin version of this charter the term is rendered scirman and explained by judex comitatus, judex provinciae, Chart. Th. 275, 276, and in this sense it is taken by Kemble, v. Saxons in England, ii. 168 sq. In another charter the same person is mentioned, but without the title : a grant of land is made by Ethelred to Winchester 'ofer Wulfsiges dæg preóstes,' Cod. Dip. Kmbl. vi. 135. This document is dated 996 ; somewhat later, in the time of Cnut, Wulfsige preóst is mentioned in connection with Kent, but then Ædelwine is scíregerêfa, Cod. Dip. Kmbl. iv. 10. In another charter (before 1011) Leófríc is scíresman in Kent. For the form scírig-, cf. (?) hýrig-mann.

Th. 3558; B. 1777. VIII. as a legal term, frequently in connection with sacu. Kemble says: 'Sōcn is inquisitio, the preliminary and initiative in Sacu, in other words the right of investigating, necessary to and a part of power of holding plea,' Cod. Dip. Kmbl. i. xlv. But from a Latin version of a charter it would seem that sōcn was the power of seeking or levying fines; the English 'Ic an heom dæt hȳ habben saca and sōcna' is rendered by 'cedens ut habeant privilegium tenendi curiam ad causas cognoscendas et dirimendas lites inter vasallos et colonos suos ortas, cuni potestate transgressores et calumniae reos mulctis afficiendi easque levandi,' iv. 202, 7. Other instances of the occurrence of the word, whose Latin form is often soca, are the following:—Ic habbe gegeofen . . . Ælfwine abbod saca and sōcna (sacam et socam, Lat.) . . . And ic wylle dæt seó sōcne (soca, Lat.) widinnen Bichāmdīc liege intō Ramsēge on eallen þingen swā full swā ic heó mēseolf āhte . . . and se abbod and đa gebrōđra intō Ramsēge habben đa sōcne (socam) ofer heom

. . . Fox 31; Men. 16. [The first part of the compound is of doubtful meaning. Bede says, 'Solmōnaþ dici potest mensis placentarum, quas in eo diis suis [Angli] offerebant;' but there is no word sol = placenta, unless it be found in the gloss panibus sol, Epinal Glossary, ed. Sweet, p. 21 a, 11. Kluge takes the word to be sōl = sun, and observes 'die form des kuchens war für die benennung massgebend,' Engl. Stud. viii. 479. Sol = mire would give a name that suggests the later February fill-dyke, and would not be inappropriate. The form sille, selle is found in some L. G. dialects, and also sporkel, which may be connected with spurcalia. See Grimm, Gesch. D. S. c. vi.]

stōc (stoc ?). A word occurring mostly in local names, either alone or in compounds. The meaning seems, like that of stōw, to be place (in the first instance perhaps a place fenced in, cf. (?) staca), and both words remain now only as names of places, Stoke, Stowe, or as parts of such names, Basing*stoke*, Tavi*stock*, Walthams*tow*. As may be seen from the Index to the Charters, Stōc occurs frequently, some of the references are here given:—Þis is ðara þreora hīda and .xxx. æcera bōc æt Stōce, Cod. Dip. Kmbl. iii. 190, 9: 34, 12. Tō Stōce, 203, 21. Intō Stōce, 123, 8. In loco, qui celebri a soliculis nuncupatur æt Stōce uocabulo, 19, 32: 33, 27. (With these two passages may be compared the following:—Apud locum ubi uulgari dicitur nomine æt Stōwe, 323, 32.) In Stōce . . . in Sūthstōce, 75, 25, 33. As an instance of a compound in which the word occurs may be given the following:—Sihtrīc abbud on Tæfingstōce, vi. 196, 1. Hī Ordulfes mynster æt Tæfingstōc (Tefingstōce, MS. E.) forbærndon, Chr. 997; Erl. 134, 14. [Crist inn oþre stokess nemmneþþ þa þosstless hise breþre. Orm. 15694.] v. stōc-līf, -weard, -wīc.

sulung, e; f. A Kentish word for a certain quantity of land, derived, like carrucata, from a name of the plough; from its origin it might mean so much land as could be cultivated by one plough. From the first two passages given below it would seem that the sulung was equivalent to two hides (manentes), and later a solanda, which is probably the same word, is said 'per se habere duas hidas.' v. Seebohm, Vill. Comm., p. 54. But perhaps it may be inferred that both hide and sulung were considered as on the same footing as regards the plough. Thus to the gebúr with his gyrd landes, i. e. one quarter of a hide, are to be given two oxen, L. R. S. 4; Th. i. 434, 23, while a gift of half a sulung is accompanied by the further gift of four oxen, Chart. Th. 470, 9–14. v. Seebohm, pp. 138–9, and generally. In the Domesday Survey of Kent the assessment was given by solins, and the word remained in use. v. Pegge's Kenticisms, s. v. sulling: —Aliquam terrae partiunculam, hoc est duarum manentium . . . ritu Cantiae án sulung dictum, Cod. Dip. Kmbl. i. 249, 19. sumer-lida, an ; m. [Lida, like the equivalent Icel. liði in sumarliði, elsewhere refers to a single object, man or ship (v. lida, sǽ-, ýð-lida), but in the passage given below from the Chronicle seems to mean a fleet. Later in the same work liþ (q. v.), which seems taken from the Scandinavians, is used in this sense, e. g. dæt lið dæt on Sandwíc læg, 1052 ; Erl. 183, 40, can sumer-lida be intended to represent Norse sumar-lið? In one other place sumer-lida occurs, in company with words relating to the sea, and it there glosses malleolus; but here perhaps sumer-loda should be read, and malleolus be taken in the sense shoot, twig. (see spræc) ; cf. O. H. Ger. sumar-lota, -lata virgultum, palmes. v. swé, swæc[c]. v. swá, swecc.

swéfan (?):—Sió gítsung ðe nánne grund hafaþ swearte swéfeþ (swéleþ? v. swélan) sumes onlíce éne ðam munte ðe nú monna beam Etne hátaþ se swefle byrneþ, Met. 8, 46–50. The Latin original has: Saevior ignibus Aetnae fervens amor ardet habendi. which is rendered in the prose version: Mauna gítsung swá byrnende swá ðæt fŷr on ðære helle seó is on ðam munte ðe Ætne hátte, Bt. 15; Fox 48, 29. From comparison of these three passages, it seems that swéfeþ should mean burns, while the form of the word suggests comparison with O. L. Ger. suêvôn in berg suêvôt mons coagulatus, with O. H. Ger. sweibôn volvere, ferri, and later English swayue in:—He (the whale that swallowed Jonah) swenges and swayues to þe se boþem, Allit. Pm. 99, 253. All these verbs denote movement, a meaning which does not seem to suit swéfan in the passage where it occurs.

Swéfas, Swéfe; pl. A Germanic people, the Suevi or Alamanni ('um diese zeit (4th cent.) pflegt an die stelle des alten Suevennamens die benennung Alamannen einzutreten,' Grmm. D. S. 348), the Swabians:—Swéfas forhergodon ealle Galliam Alamanni Gallias pervagantes, Ors. 6, 24; Swt. 276, 3. Halliwell gives sweal, swale to burn.] v. be-, for-, ge-swélan (read -swélan); sám-, unfor-swéled, swelan.

swém, es; m. A trifler, vain, foolish person:—Swém nugator, inutilis, vanus, Germ. 389, 32. Ic wylle ðæt Latona môder Apollinis and Diane fram mé gewíten, ðe Delo ákende, ðæs ðe ealde swémas gecýðdon (as the foolish triflers of old declared), Anglia viii. 325, 29. Z. xii. 408, 15.

swéman; p. de To trouble, afflict, grieve. The verb occurs in this sense in later English:—Ofte hit timed þat tat leoueste beam sorheð and sweamed meast his ealdren, H. M. 35, 5. Þe engles beod iseweamed, þat seoð hare suster swa sorhfulliche afallet, 17, 20. Ure Louerd ne mei uor reouðe wernen hire, ne sweamen hire heorte mid wernunge, A. Swemyn molestor, mereo; sweem, swemynge or mornynge tristicia, molestia, meror, Prompt. Parv. 482, col. 1. In A. S. only the compound á-swéman (q. v.) is found, apparently with the meaning to become troubled or grieved.
